

Transcript: How to find article databases using a Research Guide

The most effective way to find article databases relevant to your area of study is by searching within UNB Libraries' research guides. Select "All Research Guides" to browse or search all the guides.

Every research guide has an intermediate page that may have a more faceted list of guides. For instance, in the research guide for history, you can see a list of detailed guides that accommodate different periods, themes, and geographic regions in history. You can also find research guides for specific courses, under "Course Guides," and other relevant content, under "Related Guides."

The research guides are organized based on a tab system. For instance, in the research guide to medieval history you can see a yellow tab called "Find Articles." Inside this tab, you can see a section called "Key Resources," with three databases listed, and a section called "Additional Resources" that has other database suggestions.

In order to find the most relevant article databases for your topic, look for the "Find Articles" tab within the guides.

For more help with your research, contact us at the Research Help Desk (in person, via instant chat, via text message, or phone) or ask your subject librarian whose name and contact information appear in every research guide. Also, check out our research help page located under the "Help" tab. This page is full of research tips and includes links to useful videos.
